Survey of New York State Voters

Overview:

- 1. Generally, voters do not believe that New York will be a better place in which to live five years from now, and nearly half of them have considered – or have had a family member consider – moving out of state in the last year.

- 2. Voters largely have negative views of the way state government operates in New York.
 - 58% are dissatisfied with the performance of their state government.
 - Similarly, 58% believe that special interest groups have too much influence over state government.
 - By a four-to-one margin, voters who think that the standard of ethics of state officials have changed in the last five years believe they have gotten worse.
 - 65% believe the Governor primarily represents special interests or his own self-interests, compared to 26% who believe he represents his constituents' interests.
 - 67% believe the leaders of the State Legislature primarily represent special interests or their own self-interests, compared to 17% who believe they represent their constituents' interests.

- 3. There is overwhelming support for a variety of measures that would change the way state government operates.
 - 74% of voters favor having redistricting of legislative districts carried out by an independent, non-partisan commission.
 - 72% support initiative and referendum.
 - 68% would like to see term limits for state elected officials.
 - 66% believe the state constitution should be amended to limit spending increases by state and local governments to the rate of inflation.

Overview, continued:

- 4. New Yorkers want state leaders to address key fiscal issues by controlling state spending practices.
 - Four-fifths of voters believe New York State spends enough money on education but has to spend it better.
 - Three-quarters think that the state is not doing enough to reduce fraud, waste and abuse in the Medicaid program.
 - Nearly two-thirds believe that the best single way to close large state deficits is to reduce spending.

- 5. Voters consistently have a better view of the way their local governments operate vs. the way state government operates.
 - While 46% think the quality of public schools in New York generally is excellent or good, 59% feel that way about the quality of their local public schools.
 - More than half (54%) believe they pay too much in state taxes for the quality and quantity of services provided, however, only 36% believe they pay too much in property taxes for the quality of services provided by their local school districts.
 - While approximately two-thirds believe that the Governor and legislative leaders primarily represent special or their own self-interests, less than half (46%) feel that way about their local elected officials.

This survey was conducted by phone calls to 620 registered New York State voters in December 2005. The margin of error is +/- 3.9 percent for the total sample.
